What are your thoughts on using an ADO.NET - Data Access Objects as a data access layer for a SQL Server database. It seems like it would be more powerful than a straight ADO.NET DataSet in which you would have to manually create all of your objects. A: DTOs are generally a bad idea. They make certain data types -- including very common ones -- impossible to use, and force you to do extra work to make them usable. It's generally a good idea to use an ORM, with stored procedures for CRUD operations. This pattern leads to a system where the database (oracle, sql, whatever) can do the heavy lifting, and the application can concentrate on the logic, rather than its data access concerns. There's also a problem of coupling in ADO.NET - Data Access Objects. "I want to get the data" is the normal thing to do, and your DTOs have to support that. The more specific you get, the more unmaintainable it gets. If you have an entity framework-like thing, the generated data access objects have to support a ton of complex business logic, even to fetch and manipulate the data.
