Hyperalgesia and altered thermal and mechanical sensitivity in the rat hind paw following intrathecal injection of arachidonic acid. The effects of arachidonic acid (AA) on thermal and mechanical sensitivity in the rat hind paw were determined. AA was administered to rats in a volume of 0.5 or 1.0 microliter, and the paw withdrawal latencies (PWLs) to a radiant heat source and the paw withdrawal threshold (PWT) to a mechanical stimulator were assessed at 10 min and 3, 24 and 48 hr after injection. Both the PWLs and PWT were altered at 24 hr. Furthermore, there were dose-dependent changes in the PWLs to both heat and mechanical stimulation. Intrathecal injection of AA in three volumes (0.5, 1.0 and 1.5 microliter) produced no significant effect on the PWLs to radiant heat or the PWT to mechanical stimulation at 10 min or 3 hr after injection. However, at 24 hr the reductions of the PWLs were dependent on the dose of AA injected. The same doses did not significantly alter the paw thermal and mechanical latencies at 48 hr after injection. These findings indicate that an increased spinal AA level affects the nociceptive transmission of thermoreceptors and mechanoreceptors and that a high level of AA in the spinal cord is related to the development of hyperalgesia. Substrate specificity of membrane-bound soybean lipoxygenase-1 and its 3'-5' dioxygenase activity. Lipoxygenases (LOX) are a superfamily of nonheme iron dioxygenases that catalyze the regiospecific oxidative cleavage of polyunsaturated fatty acids. Plant lipoxygenases are membrane-bound enzymes and are commonly found in the endoplasmic reticulum. The membrane-bound soybean LOX-1 enzyme has been shown previously to catalyze the reduction of fatty acids with 13S-hydroperoxylinolenic acid as the precursor and reduced nicotinamide adenine dinucleotide as the electron donor. This form of LOX is similar to the mammalian lipoxygenases and human 5-lipoxygenase in that it is inhibited by 5,8,11,14-eicosatetraenoic acid (ETYA). In this study, we determined the effects of various fatty acids on the LO

"I know that there are lots of excited and interested persons out there. It's a real honor to be named to the Supreme Court," Roberts said in an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press." Advertisement "I'd like to know more about it before I commit to that. I think it would be helpful for someone to explain the workings of the court to me in a little more detail," Roberts added. Roberts also said he would consider the fact that Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. once worked at the firm, along with the philosophy of some of the other justices, as factors in his decision. "It's important to remember that the court justices are people. They have different backgrounds, different experiences. I know there are a lot of people out there who have been injured by statutes. Who have been hurt by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission," he said. "It's very important for somebody to explain the workings of the court to you in a little bit more detail before I commit." When the search for a new Supreme Court justice begins next Monday, Michael Anton, a George Mason University law professor, said he believes a conservative jurist who is open to the idea of campaign finance reform should be considered. "The person that should be the potential Supreme Court nominee should have a strong understanding of campaign finance law," Anton told CNN. He argued that any potential nominee should have a firm grasp of campaign finance law to consider whether it is constitutional to give corporations the right to spend freely on elections. "That is a law that has a lot of ambiguity, and if the Justices don't understand that law, how are they going to resolve that?" Anton said. Others argue that Roberts is just too conservative and would not be considered a moderate justice. A noted constitutional scholar, conservative Senator Jon Kyl, said that Roberts is conservative enough to be a supporter of campaign finance reform and represents a balanced approach to the issue. "In my view he is way too conservative for this court. He should be a Supreme Court nominee, but so was Clarence Thomas. But, Clarence Thomas' confirmation was a partisan push by the Democrats. This is not," Kyl said. "He is a supremely conservative and a great justice. The politics might be different on the campaign finance issue, but I'm perfectly comfortable with that. " The government is so simple and so much work. I want to encourage people to send a letter in support of Clinton/Trump
